Mobility description:

The utilization of nanomaterials, especially various types of nanocomposites, brings the society a unique possibility of efficient cleaning of water and soil from dangerous chemical agents. Selected types of nanomaterials represent highly effective tool where nanocomposites in particular can be used as a universal tool with broad spectrum of impact to cleaning of not only common pollutants but also persistent agents (halogenated hydrocarbons, pesticides, dioxins). In the last decade, the Czech Republic has become one of the key countries where nanotechnologies are not only being developed but also practically used for cleaning contaminated underground waters. To keep this positive trend and privileged position it is necessary to support intensive cooperation with prestigious foreign workplaces with the possibility to transfer their knowledge base. The mobility is therefore focused on development of activities of RCPTM (Faculty of Science, Palacký University) towards intensification of research with a clear goal to develop new types of highly effective nanomaterials with large application potential in environmental technologies.
